Re: Course Selection for Students Interested in Civil Rights, Human Rights,
& Public Interest Law

The following guidance about course selection may be helpful for students who are interested in pursuing a career in civil rights, human rights, and public interest law. This area of the law may involve both litigation and policy-oriented work in non-profit organizations, governmental and international agencies, and private law firms. Consequently, the suggestions below cover a wide range of subjects, and your own choices will be guided by the particular areas of civil rights, human rights, or public interest law practice you wish to pursue.

Please note that not all courses are offered every year and that some courses have enrollment caps. Please plan accordingly.

Essential Courses

The following courses are essential preparation for civil rights, human rights, and public interest law practice. Students interested in these areas should take all of these courses at the earliest opportunity:

Administrative Law
Evidence¹
Trial Practice and Procedure

Priority Courses

The following courses are especially helpful preparation for civil rights, human rights, or public interest law practice. Students interested in this field should take as many of them as possible, subject to enrollment restrictions:

Legislation

Negotiations

In addition, you should try to participate in a Residency, externship, or summer work with an organization, government agency, or law firm engaged in civil rights, human rights, or public interest law.

Beneficial Courses

The following courses may be beneficial to a civil rights, human rights, or public interest law practice:
